Dance involves a greater range of motion, coordination, strength and endurance than most other physical activities. This is accomplished through movement patterns that teach coordination and kinaesthetic memory. Dance promotes psychological health and maturity. It also fosters social interaction, and cooperation. Children have learnt to communicate ideas to others through the real and immediate mode of body movement. Children learn to work within a group dynamic. The cooperation involves, helping them learn to understand themselves in relation to others. And helps with cognitive development – as a teacher of eight children who have been involved I have seen a tangible evidence in this. Dancing in wider community school portrayed in very positive light and parental involvement saw all the parents attending the evening shows (dance troupe now has 12 children) (attachment5)
